AUTISM

A considerable body of research has accumulated recently for the design of new toys and materials for disabled children. The extent of the knowledge is vast. Research indicates that when you observe children with autistic problems, you are likely to find that they are not really just "rebellious" or "odd" but that they are children that are extremely "different" in the way they think, feel and behave. It is not that they are "different" in the way they think, feel and behave, it is that they are "different" in the way they think, feel and behave. It is not that they are "different" in the way they think, feel and behave, it is that they are "different" in the way they think, feel and behave.

A child is born with a brain that is wired for learning. The wiring is not the same for all children. Some children are born with a brain that is wired for learning. The wiring is not the same for all children. Some children are born with a brain that is wired for learning. The wiring is not the same for all children.

When the parents of a child with autism are told that their child is "different", they often feel that they are being told that their child is "different". They often feel that they are being told that their child is "different". They often feel that they are being told that their child is "different". They often feel that they are being told that their child is "different".

COMMUNICATIONS AND GROWTH. The first step is to understand the child's needs. The second step is to understand the child's needs. The third step is to understand the child's needs. The fourth step is to understand the child's needs. The fifth step is to understand the child's needs.
